Sustainable Estate Management of Plantation and Local Economic Strengthening

Arman (Universitas Trilogi)

Introduction

The agricultural sector (including plantations, forestry and fishery) is the largest sector to absorb labor. Approximately 1.11 million or equivalent to 48.63% of the total workforce relies on the sector as a source of income

In 2015, the burned area reached 167,691 hectares, with burnt peat area is 74.858 hectares. Furthermore, in 2016, the area of burnt peat is 600 hectares. The impact of the fire caused many people affected by Acute Gastrointestinal Infection disease (BRG Kontigensi Plan, 2017).

Introduction

Currently, the area of exploitation and cultivation of oil palm plantations is very wide. The cultivated area is 1.05 million Ha by large plantations and 407.41 thousand hectares by smallholdings (BPS, 2017).

Introduction

Tacconi (2003) explains that the impact of the damage is caused by the management, development and utilization of peatlands that pay less attention to ecosystems and sustainability. first, the disruption of the hydrological function of peat,

Second is the disruption of ecological functions.

Furthermore, excessive burning of peatlands can increase CO₂ emissions.

The Objective

- (1) Describe the use of plantations and
- (2) Examine the use of plantations to strengthen the local economy

Method

This research uses qualitative method through in-depth interview technique to palm oil planter. Some of the areas where the research is Mempawah, Kubu Raya and Sambas districts. Several areas were surveyed in Mempawah Regency among others is the District Anjungan, District Mempawah Timur (Village Segigih) and District Siantan (precisely Dusun Parit Ambo Pinang) and the Location of the District surveyed in Sambas District is Kecamatan Teluk Keramat (Kumpai River Village).

Result and Discussion

In general, the condition of peatlands in Anjongan subdistrict is overgrown by scrub and oil palm plantations. Most of the land conditions are still wet. In this area there are many areas of food crops and oil palm plantations. The cultivation of oil palm plantation has long been held, where most of the owners are local people. The main sources of livelihood are food crops and oil palm plantations. Food crops such as rice and oil palm plantations are livelihoods that strengthen the local economy of the community. This area had a fire in August 2017. The area of the peat area which was estimated to burn around 10 hectares.

Result and Discussion

The condition of other peat areas in Mempawah Regency, precisely in Siantan District shows that some of the land in the area is used for the cultivation of coconut and paddy fields. Field survey results show in Dusun Parit Ambo Pinang that people use peatlands as coconut cultivation areas and rice fields. The area of coconut plantations is more than 20 hectares, far wider than the area of oil palm plantations. Coconut plantations become the main source of livelihoods as well as the local economic drivers of the community. Furthermore, the cultivation of rice fields to support food needs as well as a source of income.

Result and Discussion

In contrast to Kumpai River Village, Teluk Kramat District, Sambas Regency, where the area utilizes peatlands for plantations, rice fields and horticulture. In this region there is often fire every year. Generally, it caused by the clearing of land for rice crops and plantations.

Some people open plantation land individually by burning without regard to environmental rules.

Most people think that burning land can be easier, more cost-effective and effective in terms of time.

Result and Discussion

Therefore, the management of peatlands needs to pay attention to local wisdom.

Farming is a livelihood of the people of West Kalimantan, especially most of the Dayaks.

Farming is carried out in a cycle so that the fields that have been used and left by their owners will still be used at a time when the time comes. Real land clearance always involves the whole community by way of mutual cooperation.

There are traditional leaders who lead the peatland clearance process (this method has not been applied in the survey location).

Furthermore, the results of inter-community consultation carried out the opening of the land by burning carefully and mutual cooperation. The area to be burned is limited so as not to extend to other areas. So that the burning of the area is not widespread then the edge of the field is made with a bulkhead with a distance of about 1 to 3 meters. Some communities still provide a water reservoir to prevent if the area of fire expands.

Conclusion

The results of the study show that plantation utilization has not been carried out sustainably. Land clearing often begins with burning land without considering economic and health environmental impacts. This is done because of consideration of economic motives and time. On the other hand, the use of land for plantations is an effort by the community to earn income while strengthening the local economy

The government needs to participate in increasing community participation in managing the land sustainably. The role of the government includes mentoring for the community and strengthening capacity. Furthermore, the government needs to re-explore local knowledge owned by the community to strengthen community cohesiveness and solidarity.
